Dear readers,

The year 2024 was an extraordinary one for Mission Local — in our reporting, our reach, and our fundraising. We covered the local elections like they’ve never been covered before. This paid off in increased readership, donations, and a slew of prizes — including our second “general excellence” award from the Online News Association and our first “general excellence” at the California Journalism Awards.

Our readership is higher than ever, revenue has almost doubled over the past year, and the newsroom — at 11 full-time staff — is bigger than it’s ever been.

We brought a granular level of election coverage that belied the fact that our entire staff could fit in a minivan. As the winners of that election shift from politics to government, so must we.

While in 2024 we focused on campaigns, in 2025 we will cover their consequences.

It’s clear that readers want to hold elected representatives accountable — from the mayor to the supervisors to the school board. That demand will be top of mind as we fan out across the city and report from within City Hall. You will be seeing our reporters in more neighborhoods: in the Sunset and Richmond, the Excelsior, the Tenderloin, Bayview, Chinatown and, of course, the Mission.

Criminal justice remains a critical part of our coverage and we plan a deep dive into its institutions: The courts, the police, the jails and the lawyers who both prosecute and defend those in the system.

We will be watching closely and reporting on the local impacts of President Trump’s policies on immigration, Medicaid, health care and local financing.

So, it will be a big year with lots of challenges. In no small measure, your support gives us the confidence and ability to take it on.

With gratitude,
Joe Eskenazi, Joe Rivano Barros and Lydia Chávez

Our mission

Mission statement

Mission Local is an independent, non-profit news site that produces high-impact journalism that digs deep, adds value, and engages San Francisco readers.

Core to our mission is being free and accessible to all readers. We also train the next generation of journalists, who reflect the diversity of San Francisco.

How we work

Founded in 2008, Mission Local is a tiny but mighty team of full-time staff, talented interns, volunteers, translators, and freelance writers. Our reporters speak a total of seven languages, and we report in four: English, Spanish, Cantonese and Mandarin.

Our offices are based in the Mission and, although we have told many stories from the vantage point of the Mission, we increasingly tell local and citywide stories from across San Francisco.

The city is a patchwork of unique neighborhoods that share common problems. Our reporting underscores the singularity of San Francisco's neighborhoods, but illustrates in reporting on housing, public safety, criminal justice and human interest that neighborhood coverage can tell citywide stories.

Our focus on street reporting, accountability, and the training of young journalists sets us apart from other newsrooms.

BigMoneySF

We have become known as a go-to for money-in-politics reporting. Long before 2024, we documented the vast sums being poured into the district attorney and school board recalls, alongside other elections, but last year we took those data chops and embarked on a new series: BigMoneySF.

We published our first piece in early February — an interactive web showing the connections among rich donors, public pressure groups, and political operatives seeking to remake San Francisco in their own image in the post-pandemic period. The piece was so thorough — it required combing through thousands of pages of campaign finance filings, tax forms, news reports, and more — that The Guardian republished it the same day.

We quickly followed up with a handful of stories investigating the ideology and aims of this new network, including a piece dissecting Neighbors for a Better San Francisco, the “800-pound gorilla of San Francisco politics.” As the election unfolded, we kept readers up to date on campaign spending through “Follow the Money” and other pieces, and wrote a profile of the biggest donor in the new network, venture capitalist billionaire Michael Moritz.

Our campaign finance coverage helped readers keep track of the more than $72 million poured into the November 2024 election with data and graphics to rival the big dogs. BigMoneySF was behind our “general excellence” win at the Online Journalism Awards, our finalist nod at the Nonprofit News Awards, and our “explanatory journalism” win at the Society of Professional Journalists for Northern California.

It is consistently cited as a key reason readers (and donors) turned to Mission Local last year, and we aim to continue our coverage of deep pockets in San Francisco politics in 2025.

District forums

Our weekly “Meet the Candidates” was the only series in San Francisco that provided voters meaningful information, week after week, on their supervisor and school board candidates. Across the six open districts, we asked each candidate a weekly question — many of them sourced directly from readers, residents, and district leaders during coffees our reporters held throughout the year.

It’s the kind of journalism that moves away from horse race coverage and towards substantive policy discussions, asking hopeful supervisors of District 9 what they would do about street vending, for instance, or those in District 1 about cuts to bus lines.

Voters learned who the candidates were, where they’d worked and gone to school, how they’d run their districts — anything that might help them at the voting booth.

By the end of the series, we’d asked 35 supervisor candidates — and 11 candidates for school board — hundreds of questions, their answers available online for free.

The series was cited as “outstanding election coverage” by judges during our “general excellence” win at the California Journalism Awards.

Readers told us the series was invaluable when learning about down-ballot races, and many pulled up “Meet the Candidates” at the ballot box when casting their votes.

Enterprise stories came from leads found on the campaign trail

“See How They Run” was our rotating series covering the mayor’s race — the most expensive San Francisco contest in many years. Each week, we covered a different major candidate, from Mayor London Breed to the eventual winner, Daniel Lurie, and embedded ourselves in the campaigns, attending house parties, profiling campaign staff, and accompanying the candidates as they went door-knocking, schmoozing, and kissing babies around town.

We gave voters a chance to see a side of candidates they don’t otherwise — not only focusing on the policy, campaign finance, and election alliances (though we did that too), but on how Ahsha Safa’s time at MIT influenced his urban planning focus, for instance, or the many, many Speedo jokes at Aaron Peskin’s roast.

Because we were closer to the candidates and campaign staff than any other newsroom, we had stories no one else did — like how Lurie’s team won the Chinese vote, for instance, or Mark Farrell’s attempt to be a “small business owner” on the ballot. From campaign managers to regular readers, we consistently heard: Mission Local is covering this mayor’s race better than anyone else.

These three series exemplified our election coverage in 2024, but we had dozens and dozens of other stories. We put all our coverage on an election dashboard, which became a home for campaign finance, endorsements, and other candidate information. We translated each story into Spanish and Chinese, analyzed each mayoral candidates’ policing platform, and regularly wrote analyses dissecting the state of the race. In 2024, we became the one-stop shop for understanding local politics.

Meeting our readers where they are

6

In 2024 we set a goal: to have the most accessible and compelling election coverage in San Francisco.

Knowing San Franciscans faced a complex ballot, Mission Local produced a special print edition in Spanish and Chinese highlighting the best of our election coverage. We freely offered our stories to a variety of ethnic outlets in hopes of reaching a wider audience, but many monolingual residents and seniors are best reached through print media. So, we took to the streets and hand-delivered 20,000 copies of Mission Local's best coverage, engaging with residents and community members as we dropped off copies in medical centers, public libraries, cultural centers, campuses, senior centers, restaurants, malls, and small businesses across the entire city.

Our internship program

In 2024, Mission Local brought on seven interns, more than we have ever had in a given year. From the outset, Mission Local has doubled as an educational space, dedicated to training a diverse workforce, and giving opportunities to young professionals who need mentorship and experience.

While at Mission Local, interns report and write their own stories but also receive daily guidance on how to cover breaking news, expand a story, tell a compelling narrative and ask deeper questions. Getting to cut your teeth in the industry under the guidance of world-class mentors like Lydia Chávez, Joe Eskenazi, and Joe Rivano Barros sets Mission Local apart. It also strengthens San Francisco's reporting workforce while continuing to bring untold stories to the surface.

One of our goals in 2025 is to build our capacity to train young reporters who start with us as interns. Many elite private universities financially support their student interns. While Mission Local has always offered paid internships to locals from state schools, we would like to expand our fundraising to increase internship offers to students and early career journalists without financial backing from their schools.

Even with funding, the internship length is typically 12 weeks. We know that interns would benefit from longer programs. When financially feasible, we pride ourselves on being able to keep interns who are a good fit for Mission Local's team and who need a starting point post-graduation. Ideally, we would like to create two six-month-long internships. This would give interns more time to develop as reporters and build a portfolio.

Mission Local's small newsroom meant that I got a lot of face time with the editors, allowing me to pick up reporting tips, work closely with the editors to improve my writing, and see firsthand how editorial decisions were made.

As an intern, I got experience writing many different types of stories, from short breaking news to longer features.

One highlight was covering Pride month. Writing about the iconic San Francisco event and getting to talk to so many participants firsthand was really meaningful and allowed me to learn a lot about the city.

Getting to intern at Mission Local was an invaluable experience...

What I value about Mission Local:

- Good journalism — Your reporters actually report, interview people, and dig into data.
- Local focus — (obvious!).
- Joe Eskenazi — His insights on what's happening in SF politics and why are the reason I originally started reading Mission Local, and I watch for his byline. He is an SF treasure."

“Watching the truly bizarre national media coverage on the 2024 election cycle makes me appreciate Mission Local's reporting on all the local elections even more—very concrete and relevant questions, matter-of-fact reporting on the answers—all done out of respect for readers' own judgment.”

— Yao Yue
