

Albert Chow

Is there a “war on cars” in San Francisco? Should travel by car be prioritized in the urban planning in the Sunset?

I think many residents in the Sunset feel their needs as drivers have been overlooked in recent years. Whether or not you call it a “war on cars,” there is a real concern that some policies have made it harder to get around without fully considering how people in this district actually travel.

In the Sunset, cars are still a major part of daily life. Families, seniors and workers often rely on driving because transit can be limited or unreliable. That reality needs to be reflected in planning.

At the same time, we should continue improving transit and safety. My approach is balance — making sure all modes work for the community.