Is there a “war on cars” in San Francisco? Should travel by car be prioritized in the urban planning in the Sunset?

I completely understand the deep frustration that Sunset residents feel right now, especially when City Hall is forcing top-down street modifications without any community input. I may not agree with all the recent changes, but I don't view this as a 'war on cars,' but a challenge to provide safety and fair access for everyone. Our families and seniors shouldn't feel like they are being punished for trying to get to work, drop their kids off at school, or visit local merchants.

We have to acknowledge the reality of our district. This is not downtown. The Sunset is a residential neighborhood with a lack of public transit support. Traveling by car is a necessity for many of our residents to get around.

Cars aren't going away anytime soon, and city planners should not prioritize one mode of transit to the detriment of all others. Instead, we should focus on balance, safety, and functional infrastructure. As Supervisor, I will work directly with the community to ensure that any street design changes are made collaboratively, making sure our streets are fair and safe for everyone to use.
