

San Francisco needs more housing in every neighborhood. Since 2005, well-resourced neighborhoods in the north and west sides have produced only about 10 percent of the city's new housing despite making up over 50 percent of residential land.

I've supported a variety of housing projects throughout District 2, including an affordable, teacher-focused development at 750 Golden Gate; new housing for formerly homeless veterans on Van Ness; hundreds of new homes at 3333 and 3700 California; senior housing in the Marina; and more.

Downtown must be part of the answer too. It has the transit, jobs, and infrastructure to support much more housing, and more residents there are essential to long-term revitalization.
